This layer follows the small inequalities in the surface of the lower rock like a mantle. None of these are very high or deep. On a distance of a few rods none appear to exceed two feet in vertical extent. Near the Geneva school the basal toothbearing layer appears to occupy a place eight feet lower than the highest ledge in an abandoned quarry close by. The surface of the limestone is, however, plainly eroded, and apparently to some extent oxidized. In the east bank of Sweetland creek the highest ledges of the limestone run out to the south, and the overlying formation comes down over their beveled edges. An unconformity of this kind is most likely caused by subaqueous erosion, due to marine currents, followed by renewed sedimentation in the same sea. Such events may have been accompanied by an approach of the shore line. This is, perhaps, indicated by the presence of faint traces of vegetation in the later member in this case. But at the very beginning of the second accumulation the shore was not near enough to leave a trace of anything coarser than clay. Even this was scarce at first, when calcareous sediments predominated. The persistence of each thin layer over distances of several miles goes to show that the conditions under which they were laid down were uniform over wide areas, and such conditions are not to be found in...
